

The rise and spread of modern social media has brought problems to problematic parents. Whether violent media will affect children's growth. Many researchers and psychologists have studied this issue regardless of praise or criticism that the media, especially violent media, will affect people. Some say that violent media is giving power like many comic book author Gerard Jones.

But, of course, there is a problem here. Violent video games can not only produce these effects for children, but also violent media as well. In addition, children are not only susceptible to these influences, but the likelihood that they will benefit from video games is greater than for adults due to brains like sponges. Returning to 2015, Huffington Post has published an article on the impact of constant exposure to negative news. Because we are serious, the news is the most violent program on TV. There are some very good references, I have to retract and I can tell you if they sound good:

Interactive media such as video games and the Internet is a relatively new form of media that increases the chances of positively and negatively affecting the physical and mental health of children. Online exposure to violent scenes is associated with increased aggression. As a television. In many games, children and teenagers use "embedded" games and "joysticks" (handheld controllers) to enhance experience and aggression.
